During the development of FIFA 22, a number of features – including ball physics and ball control – were developed using data collected from real-life players. The motion-capture motion-data has also been applied to player models in the game. “With the HyperMotion Technology that we’re incorporating in FIFA 22, we’re able to deliver a game that’s as close to real football as possible. We’re now able to simulate a match in true-to-life pace and emotion, with complete realism and control. “Over the course of a match, a player will make over 2,000 movements. So we’ve been able to capture all of this movement data, and now we can create a level of fluency that’s only been possible in the past. This technology will deliver a game that’s much more representative of real football, and with real human control over real-life players.” This content is hosted on an external platform, which will only display it if you accept targeting cookies. Tactical gameplay changes. Tactical improvements include more realism in formation and team selection. The selection screen for both players and formation has been improved to keep defenders and forwards separate. More details in the selected formation and position of selected players are displayed clearly in the AI, so it's easier for the player to identify areas where improvements can be made. The distinction between attacking and defending player positioning is also more obvious and more readable. For instance, defenders can readily see the distance between the central defender and the forwards. FIFA 22 adds an optional 3D view to tactics screen, so you can get a better idea of how the selected formation and players should be positioned in space to support each other. Visual cues. New visual animations aid in tactics and play. For example, when the player presses the ball from defence into midfield, a quick motion will bring the ball in line with the player. Similarly, when a player receives the ball with a strong run or a strong shot, the ball will move with the player automatically. These visual animations help players understand the pass and run more easily. This content is hosted on an external platform, which will only display

What's new in Fifa 22:

- “Balancing the Player Experience” - A brand new balance system is introduced to FIFA 22. In the past, only statistics like shots on target and wins, or games with a high tackles per game have been used to quantify player effectiveness. This is a much richer, far more balanced way of evaluating players, but it is also more difficult for a player to influence!
